A QUIET SESSION

The General Assembly of Virginia has adjourned and the dingy capitol at Richmond is deserted as it always is between sessions. The halls and corridors of the state capitol re-echo to nothing but the tramp of janitors and the hum of vacuum cleaners and brush brooms. Even the lobbyists have departed for their homes or for other fields where they can ply their trade. The session which has just ended was a quiet one. It was a session which was long on work and short on politics. It was a session which was long on economy and short on appropriations. It was a session which was long on the passage of bills and short on the passage of resolutions. It was a session which was long on the passage of bills and short on the passage of resolutions.
